PREFATORY NOTE.

THIS part of the Dictionary contains 4073 Main words, 661 Combinations explained under these, and 912 Subordinate entries of obsolete or variant forms, in all 5646. The obvious Combinations, recorded and illustrated by quotations, but not requiring explanation, number 2142 more, and bring up the total to 7788. Of the Main words, 919 are marked † as obsolete, and 164 are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following figures :—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic'.	'Century' Dict.	Funk's 'Standard'.	Here.
Words recorded	594	2753	3508	3332	7788
Words illustrated by quotations	503	1009	1125	377	6882
Number of quotations	1930	1597	2957	497	43,458

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 1675.

The following notes give some account of the separate sections of which this part is composed.

Sniggle-Sorrow. This portion of the Dictionary comprises the second half of the words beginning with SN-, and about three-fourths of those beginning with SO-. Up to the end of SN- the vocabulary is either of English origin or derived from the languages most closely related to it. Of the older native words the most important is snow sb.[1] with its many combinations, occupying altogether 17 columns. Such words as snip, snivel, snore, snort, snot, snuff, snuffle, make their appearance at various dates, and some of them have probably been adopted from the Continent. To these may be added snow sb.[2] from Dutch, and snipe, snub, from Scandinavian. Snob sb.[1] and snooze appear first as slang terms of the 18th century, and the history of the former is of some interest.

In SO- the native words still hold a prominent place, but are rivalled in number and extent by those of Romanic origin. Among those which go back to Old English are so, soak, soap, soft, some, son, song, soon, sooth, soothe, sore, sorrow, and some of these have many derivatives and compounds attached to them. The group soc, socage, soke, sokeman, soken, has considerable historical interest; the disappearance and revival of sooth, and the sense-development of soothe, are also noteworthy. Sob, which first appears in early Middle English, has no obvious cognates; a peculiar use of the noun by Shakspere proves to have been a technical term of horsemanship.

From Gaelic come the Sc. sonse, whence the more widely-used adj. sonsy, and the verb sorn; the fuller form sorren occurs as a sb. in older Sc. and in Irish use.

The French element is so extensive that only some of the more important words can be mentioned. Among those which are most distinctively French in form or origin are soar, sobriquet, sock (of a plough), socket, soil, sojourn, sombre, somersault, sorcerer, sorcery, and sorrel. The variations of older French and English spelling are well illustrated in the numerous forms of soldan, solder, and soldier; the last of these has been spelled in at least 70 different ways. In a large number of words, whether adopted through French or directly, the Latin origin is obvious, as sober, social, society, solace, solar, sole, solemn, solicit, solid, soliloquy, solitary, etc. Among recent formations from Latin stems the most interesting are socialism, socialist, and solidarity.

Italian is represented by the musical terms solfeggio, solo, soprano, as well as by solfalara and sorgho, more commonly Latinized as sorghum; the forms socle, soffit, and sonnet have passed through French.

In addition to various scientific terms (chiefly from sōlēn and sōma), Greek has contributed solecism, solecize, etc., and sophism, sophist, etc., whence sophisticate and sophistication. Sophister and sophomore have interesting academical associations.

Among the few Oriental words the most important are sofa and Sophy.

Sorrow-Speech. This portion contains the remainder of the words beginning with So- and the first instalment of those with initial Sp-. In the former group the prominent words are mainly of native origin, as sorry, so so, sough sb.[1] and v.[1], soul, sound a., sour, south (with many derivatives and compounds), sow sb.[1], sow v.[1]; souter (cobbler) is a very early adoption from Latin. Those which have come from other Teutonic languages are few and unimportant, with the exception of sound sb.[1], which appears to be partly of Scandinavian origin. A few common words are adoptions from older French, as sort, sot, sound sb.[3], v.[1], and v.[2], source, souse, and sovereign (with a remarkable variety of spellings); of later introduction from the same language are sortie, soubrette, soufflé, soup, soupçon, souterrain, souvenir, and some others. Italian has contributed the musical terms sostenente and sostenuto and the phrase sotto voce, as well as the spelling sovran introduced by Milton. Greek is slightly represented by Sotadic, Sothiac or Sothic, and some derivatives from sōtēr saviour. The only Oriental words of special interest are souchong, sowar, and soy or soya.

In the words beginning with Sp- the native element is also large and important, including spade, span sb.[1], spare, spark, sparrow, speak (which with its derivatives occupies 17 columns), spear, and speck sb.[1] A considerable number of words have obviously or probably been adopted from Dutch or Low German at different times, as span sb.[2] and v.[2], spancel, spang sb.[1] (whence spangle), spar, spath[1], spatter, spean, speck (fat), speckle, and the whaling term specksioneer, which has not been fully explained in previous Dictionaries. Of Scandinavian words the chief are spae, span-new, and sparth (the weapon of the Irish galloglasses).

The Romanic element in Spa- is for the most part directly from French, as space, Spaniard, spaniel, sparple (with several variant forms), sparver, spauld, spavin, spawn, spay, and probably spandrel. In Spe- there is an extensive group of words based on the Latin root spec-, as special (with specialism, -ist, -ily, etc.), specie, species, specific, specify, specimen, specious, spectacle, etc., occupying in all about 50 columns. An interesting set of words is ultimately derived from Gr. spathē, and comprises spatha, spathe, spatula, spatulate, spatule (with a number of Anglicized or corrupted forms), together with spade sb.[2] and spadille. Other words taken more or less directly from Greek are spadix, Spartan, spasm, spasmodic, and spastic.

In addition to the words enumerated above, the following present various points of interest: Spa, spagyric, Spanish, spank, spanking, sparrowgrass, sparse a., spatch-cock, spate, spatterdash, spayard, speaker, and spec.

Speech-Splenetic. This section contains a further instalment of words beginning with Sp-, in which the Teutonic, Romanic, and Greek elements of the English vocabulary are very fully represented. Among the native words (most of them sufficiently recorded from the Old English period onwards) are speech, speed, spell, spew, spider, spill, spin, spindle, and spit, which together with their derivatives occupy many columns in all. In addition to these there is a large percentage of words now obsolete, or surviving only in dialect use, for many of which the evidence is very scanty. A number of these, first recorded in Middle English, have corresponding forms in the other Teutonic languages, and some may really have been adopted from the Continent. An interesting example of a local form attaining a wide currency in recent years is spindrift.

The French contributions are numerous and important, including spell v.[2] (with its older variant spelder v.[1]), spice, spicery, spinach, spine, spinel, spinet, and spinney, and some aphetic forms, as spence[1], spense, spite, and splay. Latin stems are largely represented among these words, as well as in such forms as spicule, spike sb.[1], spikenard, spinal, spinous, spiracle, spirit (with many derivatives), splendid, splendour, etc. An unusual development from a Latin source appears in spittle sb.[1] (hospital).

The Greek element, adopted directly or through Latin, is in this section above the average; in addition to the words beginning with Sph- (which include sphere, spheric, etc., and Sphinx), it comprises sperm, spire sb.[3], splanchnic, splanchno-, spleen, and a variety of derivatives from some of the stems represented by these.

The precise source of many of the minor words in this section is doubtful, and some of the more important still remain more or less obscure. A few are fanciful formations on ordinary words, as speechify, spellbinder, spittoon, splendacious, while others are probably due to pure inventiveness, as spiff, spiffy, spiflicate. Some which begin with Spl- (e.g. splash) are later variants of forms with Pl-.
